The World Catalog of Changes

The Hierarchy of Changes

As with substances and states, instead of a multiple hierarchical structure of name senses, all the action expressions make up a single top-bottom structure of change terms. As a collection of actions, the category of change subsumes as its subordinate kinds actions, activities and event occurrences in a single hierarchy of change types of several level deep:

Entity > Change & Process > Action & Act & Activity & Agency & Operation & Mechanism & Behavior > Event & Happening & Occurrence & Outcome & Phenomena > Human Action & Act & Activity & Doing > ...> Nonentity

In line with the hierarchical order of changes, both natural actions and events as well as human acts and activities are subtypes of change; for, by the very definition, an event is a change happening at a given place and time, while an action is a process of change that is done by some agents, substances, forces, chemicals, or intelligent agencies.

Any thing that happens (particular events, occurrences, acts, activities, processes, becomings, or goings-on) implies (signal or presuppose) a change and thence presupposing this fact as a necessary condition of existence. Change in general is a class of all things that come to being, while events are particular changes that happen (take place, occur, go on, pass, pass off, fall, come about, come up, come to pass) in (at, on, near, or by) some places at a time (over a period of time). So event is a change that happens at a given location and time to a certain individual (or system of individuals). In other words, any event is a change endowed with spatial properties as spatiality and location and temporal properties as temporal order, duration and rate. Any event is a temporally and spatially spread-out particular, one-off entity, while change is the class of entity beyond time and space. Therefore events as happenings go through states (temporal stages and phases) and thus having beginnings, middles, and endings, modifying from one phase to another but within the same general change. In other words, events are nothing else but particular changes, another name for individual changes. Whatever changes also happens and occurs at a certain time and place, and whatever happens shows changes. All events are changes, but not all changes are events, as all liquids are fluids, but not all fluids are liquids. Anything that happens by chance or occurs at a certain time and place refers to event as a result and outcome of the changes caused or actions accomplished and performed, like as act, case, chance, consequence, doing, end, episode, eventuality, fact, fortune, incident, occurrence, or outcome.

Below is the outline of what it is to be a process of change, what its nature and essence, its content and meaning, whether has it a being or not, and how it appears, its forms and species, and all the possible instances, cases, and exemplifications

Commentary: sketching the meaning of changes in outline

Substances occupy states, but they are also liable to change. In some or other respect, any thing is in a state of flux, in condition of a continuous or discrete change. For an entity, of any sort and kind, has more than one distinct state. That means that whatever exists is given or likely to or capable to change; thus every being is changeful, alterable, variable, or changeable. Changefulness or changeability or mutability is the constancy (identity, permanence, and fixity) of the world. If there is something without change, it will be nothing, a constant, changeless, and enduring being; for nothing (not any entity) endures except Nothing, and everything is in flux: to be is to be in change, not to be is not to be in change. Thus the first axiom about changes is: all things, beings, or entities make or become different in state and so participating in the process of change.

Being a primitive class of entity, along with substance, state, and relation, change is a manifold, multiform and complex entity, too. It can be essential or accidental, superficial or deep, material or conceptual, partial or whole, natural or artificial, regular and constant, spontaneous, chanceful, and eventful. This character of changes is expressed by a multitude of synonymous terms: alteration, conversion, damage, difference, diversity, development, devolution, flux, innovation, mutation, modification, novelty, passage, qualification, regeneration, renewal, renewing, reversion, revolution, shift, transformation, transition, transmutation, turn, variation, variety, vicissitude, and suchlike. Because of its status of a pivotal class of entity, the knowledge of change, its nature and forms of existence, kinds, forms and manner of action, its causes and effects, as well as the ways of measuring and analyzing of different sorts of motions and movements, is among the key issues of human knowledge and understanding of the universe.

As to the forms of changes, in compliance with three types of real entities, there are typically three forms of change's existence as natural changes, mental changes, and cultural changes. But whatever its domain of action or operation, as a primary class of being, change operates and acts as a process of change, a series of distinct states, during which entity or being becomes different either in substance, or in state, or in action, or in relation. In the language of properties, a change in general is a change of the property of entity: the property of being a substance, the property of being a state, the property of being acted upon or of acting in a certain way, and the property of being related to something else. As a result, any specific change, natural process, mental action, or social activity, should fall under one of the following top headings:

- a change of substance, or substantial changes;
- a change of state (quality and quantity), or stative changes (qualitative changes and quantitative changes);
- a change of change (in action, variation); or variable (functional) and dynamic changes;
- a change of relation (in correlatives), or relational changes

Under these four change types can be subsumed the six traditional forms of change: substantial processes, generation (coming-to-be and becoming) and degeneration (destruction or passing away); quantitative processes, increase, growth, and decrease, diminution in magnitude or size; qualitative processes, alteration in quality; a change of position, a relational change, motion, movement and rest, equilibrium, as well as a change of form (physical states) as a sort of stative processes.

The first sort of processes is a change of a substantial nature, coming into being from other being, genesis, a process of change during which one or more substances transform into one or more other substances. What undergoes change here is the substrate itself, when the entity changes as a whole, from one substance to one or many other substances. Substantial changes seem to be most dramatic and fundamental changes as it is illustrated by generation, production or corruption and damage (annihilation and extinction) of physical objects, chemical substances, living organisms, ideas, or whole civilizations. For example, any process of forming of a compound or a complex as a single substance in which the entity parts lost their individuality and identity comes under radical, deep changes. In nature, this sort of change covers all kinds of subatomic interactions and chemical reactions, as decay, fermentation, corrosion, digestion, combustion, etc. In human life, birth and death, creative processes, discoveries, making novel artifacts also falls under the substantial changes.

The second in the list of distinct changes is a modification of the state of an entity as a transition of an entity from one state to another, as a difference between states, while the substance retains the same identity. For instance, a transition of an object from one state position to another is specified as motion or movement, which is exemplified by a mechanical motion. Another example is a change of physical states, sometimes called a change of form, from solid to liquid, liquid to gas, gas to liquid. Under the change of quality fall material changes resulting in producing a heterogeneous mass, body, aggregate, collection, complexity, or mixture in which different entity parts still retain their identity. Here also come some biological changes such as genetic and chromosomal mutations, mitosis and meiosis of cells, the series of division changes.

A subclass of stative change, the change of quantity includes decreases and increases of the magnitudes of objects. In the order of physical quantities, a quantitative change is a change of energy, including all forms of energy, as well as the energy change pertaining to the transfer of energy and energy interactions of objects such as heat and work. Again, any changes of state with regard to human conditions, emotions, and desires, as want and satisfaction, belong to the class of stative changes of conditions, either of a qualitative nature or a quantitative form.

The third change type is a process of change during which the state of action, operation, or agency changes its mode of acting or operation under the action of other change, what is typically referred as the changing cause of change. Examples of such difference in the manner of action may be the transitions from one distinct form of change to other, from rest to motion, destabilization, from motion to rest (negative acceleration), as well as all sorts of accelerative acts and processes increasing the rate of change. All changes in policy, practice, doing, and use are the changes of human action and activity. Here belongs also the irregular cycles of generation and destruction, growth and diminishing, rotary and linear motions.

The fourth type of change is a process of change during which one sort of relationship changes into other kinds (marriage/separation). As there are changes in respect of substance or essence, state or quality and quantity, change or activity, so there is change in respect of relation. When one or both correlatives change, we have another relation; for if the husband dies, the wife becomes a widow, thus changing its family relationship, or social role and status.

Then whatever people do or cause to happen, their actions, activities, acts, doings, proceedings, can be classified as radical substantial changes, qualitative changes, quantitative changes, variable changes, or relative changes.

To have a full and consistent classification, changes are correctly to classify with respect to the kinds of substances they refer to or the sorts of states they relate. Accordingly, we can specify four broad groups of processes of changes:

- ❖ physical processes, the collection of all natural processes, physical, chemical, and biological;
- ❖ mental events (cognitive processes of the mind), the total of psychological processes and experiences, together with formal, logical processes;
- ❖ cultural processes, the collection of all possible human actions, activities, and acts;
- ❖ knowledge representation processes performed by intelligent computing systems

Besides, there are five elements in any particular change:

- that which changes (quality or quantity);
- that which is in change (substratum, body or state or action);
- that in which change takes place (time or space);
- that from which it starts (initial state);
- that to which it proceeds (final state, an effect, end, purpose, consequence, or result of change);
- what causes a change

At last, every change suggests the following: whatever changes changes in three ways, essentially, partially or accidentally; there is a substrate underlying the processes of change; there are changes in kind and in degree; and things may undergo all the forms of change at the same time, destruction, motion, and growth.

Such is then the number and nature of the kinds of change, or what it is to be a change. So the essence and content of change consists in the action of changing of entities by making (or becoming) different in substance, state, action, or relation, and its basic meaning and consequence consists in being a cause or effect. For every change is at the same time also a cause and/or effect. Nothing happens without a cause-change, and nothing exists from whose being an effect-change does not follow. In other words, every change (process) is followed and preceded by other changes (processes). Neither object, nor state, nor relation but changes constitute causes and effects. Human actions, wars, diseases, emotions, crimes, births, deaths, etc. are both changes and causes or effects. By this reason, the knowledge of change is the knowledge of cause and effect. Since revealing the nature, meaning and content of change is equal to revealing the number and nature causes, the engine and driving forces of the universe.

The major principles and postulates to be used as the premises of reasoning about changes can be summarized as follows:

- The world is the totality of processes of change;
- Nothing endures but Nothing, all entities are mutable;
- Any change entity is a composition of two or more states, or a change is a second-order state;
- Changes differ in type \(decay, increase\), sphere \(substance, quantity\), and manner;
- Any process of change is a sequence of differing states of the same change;
- Whatever changes is changing \(turning\) into a different substance, state, action, or relation;
- There are substantial changes, stative changes, variable processes, and relational changes.
- Every process of change is followed and preceded by other processes;
- Every change is either a cause or effect; the essence of changes is to enter into causal relations, to be and to have causes and effects;
- Every event, happening, or occurrence is an instance of a process of change.

THE STANDARD FORMULA OF MEANING OF ACTION WORDS

A change term (of actions, activities, and event occurrences) ⇔ the generic term (of changes) + the characteristic expressions (of relationships, actions, states, objects)

The Regular Pattern of Definition for Action Names:

An action name (a type of change) ⇔ a generic name (a higher class of the change) + the expressions of objects, states, or relations (a convertible property)

‘Change is becoming of something from something to something else’

‘Change is a class of things that happen and have distinct states’

‘Event is a change that take place (occur, happen, go on, pass, pass off, fall, come about, come up, come to pass, or come to being) in (at, on, near, or by) some places at a time (over a period of time)’

The Common Rule of Verbal Definitions for Change Verbs:

Verbs (of changes and actions) ⇔ the universal terms (to have, to be) + the characteristic expressions (of substances, states, or relationships)

The alternative standard verbal formulation implies the generic verb of the term and distinguished by the specific manner and form of the change or action or doing signified, as in:

Verbs (of changes, actions, and processes) ⇔ the generic term (the general class the change) + the expressions (of relationships, states, or objects)

‘to occur (happen, go on, pass, pass off, fall, come about, come up, come to pass) is to come to being’

‘to fall is to occur at a specified time or place’

‘to coincide is to happen at the same time’

‘to develop is to become evident’

WordNet 2.1: entity {physical entity (process: physical process, phenomenon, evolution and devolution, economic process, human process, growth, industrial process, natural process, organic process), abstract entity (psychological feature (cognition, knowledge: cognitive process, unconscious process; motivation, motive, need; event: human action, activity, or act; happening, occurrence, occurrent, or natural event; group action; social event))};

The WordNet's taxonomy of changes should be completely reclassified and redefined in order to accord to the nature of changing things and thus to be logical and uniform. Since all modifications of changes ought to lie within one class, which is neither relation nor quality, but changes, and since a change is divisible only into changes, as a magnitude into magnitudes. Consequently, both events and human actions are the subtypes of change as according to the order of changes:

Entity > Change > Action > Process > Phenomena > Event > Happening, Occurrence, or Outcome > Human Act, Action, or Activity > ... > Nonentity

In the descending order of changes, the event is a change happening at a given place and time, the action is a change that is done by some agents, substances, forces, chemicals, or intelligent agencies. This intends that events are merely particular changes, and physical processes, changes in concrete things, belonging to a process of change that happens as an ordered sequence of states.

So below 'event' names used as the generic terms in definitions ought to be replaced by the name of 'change', like in:

1. change, alteration, modification -- (a change that occurs when something passes from one state or phase to another; "the change was intended to increase sales"; "this storm is certainly a change for the worse"; "the neighborhood had undergone few modifications since his last visit years ago")
