

UNIVERSAL STANDARD ENTITY CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM: THE CATALOG OF THE WORLD

The World Ladder: Being, Existence, Entity, Thing (the universal class, everything) > ... > Nonbeing, Nonexistence, Nonentity, or Nothing (the null class)

The Comprehensive Hierarchy of Things is the grouping (organization or classification) of things (beings, entities, realities) as hierarchically ordered divisions (categories, classes, kinds, types, differences, determinations, distinctions, modes, ways, and varieties) and levels (layers and strata).

The World Body of Entities is composed of several constituent components:

Everything -- all things, things of every kind and type, the totality of things, whatever exists, everything that exists anywhere, the World or Reality or Existence or Cosmos or Macrocosm or Being or Entity;

Thing -- that which has reality (or being) or conceived to be (or to exist) as some sort of entity, substance, state, change or relationship;

Anything -- a thing of any kind and sort;

Something -- a thing of some kind;

Nothing, Nonentity, Nonexistence, Nonbeing -- a nonexistent thing, not any being, thing, or existence, not any particular thing, an object, state, act or relation.

The World Catalog of Substances

The Hierarchy of Substances

It is generally recognized that substances are among the basic classes of things in the world, that they have parts, kinds and properties, that they can be in various states, participate in changes and processes, and stand in different relations. As all reality, substances are also organized into several distinct levels: natural (physical, chemical, and biological, all the concrete objects of the material world); mental (the psychological objects of the mental world); social (all the social institutions and cultural objects); and the cyberworld of intelligent objects.

Traditionally, all substance is divided into individual objects (primary substances) and naturally occurring classes of substances (secondary substances). Therefore, as the basic class of things, substance is often identified either with a physical object, substantial individual, or body or with the underlying structure of individual objects, the stuff, material, or matter of special objects. Such understanding is reflected in the contrary (distributive and collective) interpretations of substances, viewed either as substantive individuals, the elements of the aggregate, or as a unitary whole of its parts. The near examples of objects are particular things, or specific individuals, which are numberless and expressed by count nouns. It is commonly believed that an object is an aggregate of properties restricted to a particular space-time, or that any object is a distinct existence having mass and occupying space. Additionally, every set of concrete objects is taken to be partitioned into two disjoint sets, one of the physical objects, the other of the mental objects covering conceptual objects as ideas and constructs.

On the other hand, any object is always made of some substance as its stuff and essence, or each concrete object (as a thing) is a complex which unites substance (matter) and form (properties or states). Then concrete objects are substances having states (represented as data elements), showing behaviors and affected by changes, actions, or processes (represented in operations, procedures, functions, or methods). It appears that in defining and classifying a substantial entity, it is of necessity to distinguish between two notions: a generic entity having a natural unity (as a single entity of objects of a kind) and a physical thing existing as an individual substance. Again, instead of splitting substances into disjoint class of substantial individuals and a class of constructs, we have to classify them either as natural kinds or mental kinds or cultural kinds or computational kinds, where the kinds are the intersection of the greater classes, while the individuals made of the kinds are their exemplifications or instances.

So, underlying particular objects of all sorts and manner, substances exist as:

- ✚ what can be sensed or measured (matter, physical stuff, material, objects, agents, persons);
- ✚ the contents of the mind, what may be thought about, remembered, imagined, or fancied (mental or intelligible), inclusive all sorts of abstract objects;
- ✚ the human institutions of the social world, together with traditional cultural artifacts produced and created through the agency of the mind;
- ✚ the virtual domain of objective knowledge and artificial intelligences, the cyberworld of intelligent objects

It turns out that the world of objects should be viewed as organized in an increasing order of complexity from the underlying substance, substrate or stuff to matter to concrete objects and wholes to complexes, compositions, compounds, bodies, systems, and aggregates of higher complexity:

Entity > Substance & Substratum & Essence & Stuff > Matter & Material & Body & Mass & Object > the Elemental Substance & Particle & Atom & Element & Molecule > Composition & Mixture & Compound & Aggregation > the Universe (the totality of objects) > the Earth (Globe) > Life (the animate domain, organisms (plants, microorganisms, animals)) > Humankind > Mind (the realm of mental objects) > Society (the domain of social objects) > Culture (the realm of knowledge, the production of art, religion, science, and technology) > Cyberspace >...> the Null Entity

The scheme shows that all the objects are arranged into classes, which are hierarchically ordered by an inheritance relation; thus being divided into subclasses (contained classes, child classes, or derived classes) and superclasses (containing classes, base classes, or parent classes). Existing within a hierarchy, each subclass inherits all the characters of its superclass and so specifying the data elements and the operations of its instances or objects. In other words, all substance signifies both that which is individual objects, the subject of states (properties), as well as the classes of objects predicated of individuals and ordered by an inheritance relation. Being more fundamental entities than the individual objects, the generic substances exist in kinds, classes, groups, orders, or genera, expressed by mass nouns or collectives, and there are many varieties or species in each class, kind, or genus.

Essentially, all substances make up a hierarchy characterized by the rule: all the properties of a generic substance are the properties of its kinds, varieties, varietals, and individual objects. And what is predicable about a kind is predicable of its species and individuals, or the classes of objects can be arranged and ordered by the relation of inclusion (containment, a part-whole relation). That is, as kinds and classes, substances with their differentiae are the classes of things not only predicable of the individual objects, but also present in them as something essential and material. There are some other essential consequences (theorems) of the axiom of inheritance noteworthy of formulating:

- ✚ The substance should fall under the same division as the kinds;
- ✚ If a kind of substance belongs to two substances, the one is included by the other;
- ✚ What contains the kind contains the class;
- ✚ If classes are different, their properties are different in kind;

Another distinctive mark of substance, either as a qualified class or as an individual, it has no contrary, if not to allow a class of antimatter as a negative class. Nor it admits the variation of degree, unlike its attributes. But all real substances admit contrary qualities. Thus, there emerges a general axiom: all substance is subject to a process of change such that the quantity of substance remains unchangeable. The axiom applies to physical and chemical objects as the conservation principle when in the course of physical changes or chemical reactions the fundamental quantities remain unchanged, as it is stated in the law of conservation of matter (mass) or the law of conservation of energy and the mass-energy equivalence. Given the principles of classification and the fundamentals of substances, the task of arranging of all objects, spatial and nonspatial, material and nonmaterial, into separate categories and classes is much simplified. Thus, instead of a multiple hierarchical structure of the names of substance, all substantive expressions are to be arranged (placed and positioned) in a single hierarchy of substantive terms with the most general meaning being at top. The hierarchical scheme added with the system of axioms and rules of behavior will constitute a foundation for consistent description of substances and objects. If briefly, the primary principles of substances can be summarized as follows:

- Substance is one of the first divisions of entity;
- Substance is a single entity of objects with different classes, kinds, species, and particulars;
- All substances form a single hierarchy of kinds of objects with universal bounds;
- All the properties of a substance are the properties of its species and individuals;
- The world is the totality of substances standing in various relations.

Commentary: sketching the meaning of substances in outline

The meaning of the whole word (or sentence) is composed of the sum of the meanings of its component parts; therefore the significant content of words can be often determined morphologically through morphemes, rather than roots and stems. Being the smallest lexical units and building materials of words (nouns, adjectives, and verbs), morphemes can appear as combining forms, from acantho- to -zyme and zymo-, affixes as prefixes with negative prefixes, from a- to ultra-, infixes, or suffixes (or postfixes with inflectional endings and terminations). The listing of such language units for English mainly consists of Greek and Latin elements and well tabulated with all the corresponding meanings [Greek and Latin Elements in English, Combining Forms; Webster Dictionary].

Seeing that the constituent parts of the word make up its significance, the names of substances can be distinguished by their morphological markings at the first place, as it happens with the names of agents, which may indicate:

- ✓ biological agents as active causes, persons, animals;
- ✓ physical and chemical substances as exerting some force or effect;
- ✓ instruments and various artifacts;
- ✓ meaningful software agents and intelligent applications

An agent is thus that which does, exerts power, produces changes, or performs actions, which designation marked by a member of the set of typical agent morphemes acting as a classifier (signifier or descriptor) and indicating the distinct semantic class the agentive noun belongs:

-AN, -ANT, -ARY, -ENT, -ER, -OR, -IST, -EE, -AR, -IAN, -ICIAN, -ITE, -STER, -TRIX, -IER, -IC, -ID, -IUM, -IDE, -IN, -LYTE, -GEN, -GOGUE, -ETTE, -EN, -ESS, -URE

As instances may serve the following typical agent names: 'American', 'attendant', 'notary', 'president', 'computer', 'editor', 'scientist', 'refugee', 'liar', 'physician', 'mobster', 'aviatrix', 'cashier', 'critic', 'solid', 'uranium', 'oxide', 'usherette', 'chicken', 'actress', 'ligature', 'hypnogogue', 'virucide', 'mitogen'.

On the other hand, typical endings for the general names meaning a collection of (or aggregate or class or kind) objects are as follows: -ADE, -AGE, -ERY, -HOOD, -SHIP, -DOM, -AD, as 'cavalcade', 'leafage', 'machinery', 'jewelry', 'priesthood', 'readership', 'Christendom', 'triad'.

Special groups of words constitute the names of living things and chemical substances and the branches of knowledge and life; they can be easily differentiated by the name endings. To form the names of classes and orders of animals, the lexical descriptor -acea is used, while the names of superfamilies are marked by -oidea, of families by -idae, of subfamilies by -inae. The endings -acean and -id are applied to a member of a class or a family of animals, as in 'crustacean', 'arachnid' or 'leporid', while -ad is used to name plants, cycad. The names of family of plants end in -aceae, like as in the family names of pinaceae or vitaceae. But still many class names of animate beings should be kept in memory. The matter is plain with chemical substances where chemical elements are marked by -ium suffix and many compounds are distinguished by specific endings, like fats, proteins, and glycerids as neutral compound denoted by the suffix -in, or the binary compounds with non-metallic elements are marked by the suffix -ide. Things also look simpler with the names of sciences, arts, systems, and practices commonly marked by the ending -ics, 'mathematics', 'linguistics', 'politics', 'robotics', 'athletics', or by -logy, 'biology', 'ontology', 'technology', or by -ism, 'nationalism', 'capitalism'. Though, to relate this type of names fully to the class of the substance names would be a mistake. Since, for example, the ism words may refer to changes (processes, acts, actions, behaviors) or their results; to states and conditions of being; or, specifically, to beliefs and teachings as well as to social practices, like sexism not belonging to substantive names, if only as sexist.

Thus the denomination class of substances amounts to a wide variety of things expressed by the names of substances. Among such things are concrete persons, objects, and places named by proper names; an individual example of a class of thing or the class as a whole, both named by class substantives which have in turn the subdivisions: a collective name referring to a collection or aggregate of individuals and a mass noun denominating the whole class of thing such as physical substances and materials taken in general and of which particular objects are composed.

Altogether, the substantive names denote the following kinds and varieties of substance:

- entity (thing, object, physical object, causal agent; group, collection);
- nonliving things and objects (substance, matter, stuff, material; natural object; artifact; food);
- living beings (organism; animal, fauna; plant, flora; human being, person; body, corpus);
- the parts of substance (atoms, components, constituents, elements, fractions, fragments, ingredients, members, particles, pieces, portions, sections, segments, shares, and subdivisions).

To meet to the above requirements, natural language employs three types of substantives or substantive names:

the class name denoting either an example (instance) of a class of substance (a person or an animal) or the class as a whole (person or animal) or one example (a part, portion, piece, unit, item) of a mass;

the collective name referring to the collection (grouping or assemblage) of objects as one aggregate, whole, or unit (collective singular) or to the members of the collection as separate persons or units (collective plural);

the mass name including abstractions and referring to (physical) substances, bodies, materials, liquids and gases in general, of which special objects and separate units are composed of;

It turns up that under the class-names, it is subsumed all kinds of countable objects: concrete objects, persons, animals, plants, units, and parts of a mass, body, or whole. Under the mass names denoting all substances of uncertain quantity are included all sorts of uncountables: fluids, liquids, gases, solids, materials, languages, etc. The collectives as the nouns of multitude behave either as abstract singulars or concrete plurals, thus depending on the contextual meaning, standing either for a single entity or for the elements and objects composing such entity. Then, with some qualifications, concrete beings, individuals, physical objects, material existences, agents, matters, bodies, and systems come under the heading of substance as a primal class of things.

The Standard Formula of Meaning for Substantive Terms:

An entity term (of substances) ⇔ the generic term (the general category of the entity) + the property differences (of relationships, actions, states)

SUBSTANCE -- the entity constituting the essence of objects: physical, animate, psychological, social, and computational

All substances have properties or attributes, or they are the kinds of objects which are determined by the collection of properties. Since objects are characterized by properties (attributes, qualities, or quantities), they have always to be in some state or condition, a state of being (existence) of an entity with respect to substantial properties, quality and quantity, or with reference to attributes for formal objects. That means that state as the essential differentia of the substance is all the properties and modifications of substances that alter (qualities and quantities) and in virtue of which objects are said to change. Or, more generally, it can be defined as the way (manner, mode) an entity is with reference to its substantial properties (qualities and quantities). The way something is with respect to its formal attributes refers to the states of formal objects. If property is an essential state shared by all members of a class of things, attribute is a formal property shared by all members of a class of formal objects; for attributes and predicates just represent properties, substantial or formal.

For individual objects, state is defined as the union of its individual properties; accordingly, the totality of all the individual's states constitutes its state space (or quality space or quantity space or attribute space), within which all its behaviors and changes take place. Unlike individual states, the generic states are constructed as the aggregates of universal properties. Therefore such state types are to be classified with respect to the kinds of substances they relate. According to the types of substances, we can specify four types of general state:

- ❖ physical states, the collection of all universal material properties, like the states (forms) of matter (phase, liquidity, solidity, gas);
- ❖ mental states (cognitive states of the mind), the total of cognitive powers, capacities, abilities, along with conceptual states embracing all formal properties as attributes, functions, and predicates;
- ❖ cultural states, the collection of all possible traits, characteristics, features, qualities of social objects and institutions;
- ❖ representational states, the collection of all information knowledge states of intelligent objects

Being the most crucial mode of reality, the category of states, spanning from the state of existence (beingness, being) to the state of not being (nonexistence), comes as the generalization of properties, qualities, quantities, and formal attributes, as well as of states of affairs, conditions, and situations. Instead of a multiple hierarchical structure of (state) name meanings, all stative expressions are to be placed in a single hierarchy of state terms. As a collection of properties, the category of state subsumes as its subordinate kinds substantial properties (attributes), qualities and quantities, as it is shown in a single hierarchy of state types of several level deep:

Entity (Being, Existence) > State & Condition & State of Affairs > Substantial Property & Attribute > Quality & Character & Feature & Characteristic & Nature > Quantity & Amount & Measure & Dimension > Multitude > Magnitude > Energy >...> Elementary Unit >...> Quantum >...> Nonbeing

The state types are marked by the rules of behavior:

1. The state type should fall under the same division as its kinds;
2. If a state belongs to two types, then the one type is included by the other;
3. What contains the state subtype contains the state genus as well;
4. If states are different in kind, their equivalent classes of substances are different as well;
5. All the states of an entity are the states of its kinds, species and individuals.

The primary principles of states are as follows:

- The category of state is among the first divisions of entity;
- The collection of properties in virtue of which a thing changes makes a state type;

- All states form a hierarchy of state types with the state of being at the top and the state of nonbeing at the bottom;
- A state is a member of a hierarchy of states where a first-order state is a state of substance.
- All the states of an entity are the states of its species and individuals
- The world is the totality of generic states standing in various relationships

Commentary: sketching the meaning of states in outline

State is a mode of being (existence) determined by substantial properties, attribute, quality, and quantity. There are two basic kinds of states as stative properties: a) quality as an essential property (attribute) of an entity; b) quantity (measure, amount, or quantum) as a measurable property (attribute) of things. As a general class, state subsumes as its subordinate kinds both the class of quantities and the class of qualities. That is, states exist in such a hierarchy that if the union of quantity and quality constructs the higher genus of state, their intersection results in a qualitative quantity or quantitative quality, such as form, figure, or shape. It exists as conditions, situations, qualities, properties, and quantities.

Quantity is a state of being much. It has no contrary, no variation in degree and comes up as discrete (number, multitude) or continuous quantum (the magnitude of geometry and physical quantities - time, place, etc.). Equality and inequality are characteristics of quantity, or their most distinguishing character is to be predicated by equality and inequality. There exist several essential axioms and assumptions: quantities are wholes consisting of the parts, either having a relative order, as any magnitude (state variable) and multitude (number), or without a relative order of parts, like planes and solids.. Quantities have no contraries, like substance, but unlike qualities, which do have contraries. Existing as continuous or discrete, quantities are thought incapable of admitting of variation of degree, unlike qualities which are liable to alteration (variation, modification) in degree or in kind.

In science, quantity is regarded to be prior to quality, since quantities are likely to be universal qualities of objects, whereas qualities are the necessary parts of experience, as the qualities of sensations, perceptions of the mind, mental powers. Specifically, quantity is split into physical quantities (dimensions or variables), geometrical magnitudes (lines, surfaces, and solids, figures and shapes), and mathematical multitudes: non-referential, abstract state variables and numbers (natural, rational, irrational, real, complex, and data). An ordered collection of numeric data or information such as scientific, technical, financial or statistical data together with data-processing operations makes up numeric data bases. Therefore, computational ontologies are sometimes defined as a collection of information (data types) about classes and relations of a domain of knowledge.

Quality is a state of being such and such. It has a contrary and varies in degree. Due to possession of qualities, substances change or changed. It is taken to be of four different sorts: the human qualities (habits: knowledge, virtue; disposition: beauty and health); the inherent capacities (the powers of sensitivity, rationality, reactivity, etc.); the affective or sensible qualities (colors, odors, textures, tastes, heat, cold, etc.); the qualities of things (figure, size, weight, mass, and shape). Similarity and difference are characteristics of quality.

The name of state indicates being-in-state or state-of-being taken in its general reference and meaning as abstracted from all sorts of specific states, conditions, states-of-affairs, situations, circumstances, and cases. The state names belong to a subclass of words mostly derived from adjectives (of attributes) or state verbs by adding the state markers (descriptors or classifiers):

-AGE, -ANCY, -ENCE, -ENCY, -ETY, -ITY, -IBILITY, -CION, -SION, -ION, -TION, -TUDE, -SHIP, -HOOD, -NESS, -TH, -ACY, -OSITY, -Y, -ISM, -CRACY, -DOM, -ERY, -TY.

The state names standing for the state (condition, quality, property, or quantity) of entity includes all nouns of state, condition, quality, quantity, and property, like 'bondage', 'arrogance', 'existence', 'activity', 'reversibility', 'condition', 'magnitude', 'friendship', 'falsehood', 'happiness', 'truth', 'strength', 'fallacy', 'verbosity', 'orthodoxy', 'skepticism', 'theocracy', 'wisdom', 'slavery', 'cruelty'.

In some cases the prefixes may be as important in defining nominal meanings as the suffixes. So are the prefixes designating the multiples and submultiples of physical units of such as length, weight, temperature, sound, power, frequency, or electrical current. For instance, the prefixes of multiples of physical units are: deca-, hecto-, kilo-, mega-, giga-, tera-, peta-, exa-, while the prefixes of submultiples are deci-, centi-, micro-, nano-, pico-, femto-, atto-.

Each stative noun can be modified, defined, limited, or described by other nouns, adjectives, clauses, and determiners (identifiers or quantifiers), thus forming a state noun phrase.

The standard meaning of state names of conditions, attributes, qualities, and quantities:

a specific name (a type of state, quality or quantity) ⇔ a generic name (the state of being, the state of having, a class as essence and substance) + the expressions of substances, actions, or relations (a convertible property, difference, characteristic, character, nature, attribute, distinction, feature, peculiarity, quality, mark, singularity, or trait)

The listing of general names of states:

State noun indicating state of affairs, condition, state of matter, and state of mind;

Attributive noun implying a formal attribute (properties, dimensions) of objects or persons;

Quality name indicating the essential attribute of a thing;

Quantity name designating an amount, quantum, dimension, or unit of measure;

Property names standing for the essential attribute of a class of thing

According to the meaningful formula for stative names, to define the words marked by the state classifiers, like –NESS and –TY, means to signify the state (or quality) of being what the adjective (or the original verb) describes differentiated with the characteristics expressed by non-stative expressions, as in:

‘reality is the state of having substance’

‘existence is the state of existing’

‘materiality is the state of being composed of matter or having physical substance’

‘oneness is the state of being one’

‘activity is the state of producing a change or exerting an influence’

‘skillfulness is the state of having knowledge or skill or aptitude’

‘condition is a state of existence of a thing’

‘situation is the state of things at a given time’

‘plurality is the state of being many’

‘utopia is the state of society being perfect in social, moral and political respects’

‘magnitude is a mode of quantity marked by dimensionality’

‘multitude is a mode of quantity ordered by numbering’

‘dimension is the magnitude of a thing considered to be measurable’

‘paternity the state of being a father’

‘maternity the state of being a mother’

Note that most stative names have a triple meaning of three different kinds, following the common rule of entity names to signify general things, their concrete instances or all the instances collectively. For example, –ity, –ty, or –ety words signify either the state (the quality or the quantity) taken in the most general sense, or, concretely, an instance of the state (quality or quantity), or, collectively, all the instances and cases. Consider the term reality signifying the state of being real, that which is real, or an actual thing, object, situation, event, and link, and the aggregate sum of real things. Or, take universality, spirituality, humanity, formality, ideality, legality, modernity, barbarity, deity, liberality, enormity, monstrosity, fatality, festivity, ambiguity, commodity, novelty, speciality, numerosity, multiplicity, poverty, prosperity, ability, capacity, honesty, sensibility, stupidity, casualty, and suchlike.

The standard meaning formula of state verbs showing conditions, attributes, qualities, and quantities:
