The World Catalog of Relations

THE HIERARCHY OF RELATIONSHIPS

We all agree that things exist in various relations, or that relations are the glue of the universe. On the other hand, relationship constitutes not only a mostly crucial class of things, but also mostly elusive entity for understanding and verbal description. As a matter of tradition, there are several senses in which things are thought to be related to each other (or to be of something else): as the contained to the containing, as the active to the passive, as the measurable to measure, the knowable to knowledge. As far as the number of higher-order entities is established as substances or objects, states, changes, actions, or processes, and relations, the full list of entity-entity relationships will include all the possible associations and connections between the primary kinds of things. Which are the pairs of object-object, object-state, object-change, and object-relation; of state-object, state-state, state-process, and state-relation, etc. Thus in the relationship the most conspicuous interrelations appear to be those which are between the entities of similar types, as in:

- the relationship of substances (objects, natural and abstract, and artifacts);
- the relationship of states (of properties, quantities, and qualities), or stative relationships;
- the relationship of changes (actions, activities, operations, and processes), or active and dynamic relationships;
- the relation of relationships, relative connections or associations.

For instance, a hierarchy of material substances, from elementary particles to large-scale physical aggregates, belongs to the field of substantial relations. Equality and inequality as well as logical relations of ideas and mental relations of conscious states fall under types of relations involving states, quantitative and qualitative. The relation of cause and effect and temporal relationships come under the sorts of relations involving changes, actions, or processes. At last, analogy or proportion, the resemblance of relations, together with logical relations will be subsumed under the connections of specific relationships.

As with substances, states, and changes, all the relative types make up a single top-bottom structure of relating entities. So, the class of relations is organized in a single hierarchy of connective kinds of finite depth, from the highest level of generality to the bottom level of specificity:

Entity > Relationship & Connection & Association & Interrelation > Whole-Part Relations > Comparison & Opposition > Entity-Entity Relations > Causality > Domain Relations (physical, chemical, biological, psychological, social, computational) > Force > Chemical Bond > Fundamental Interactions >...> Nonentity

The taxonomy of relative words from general domain-independent terms to domain-specific terms follows the order of relationships in the world where the domain specificity is increasing in line with the increasing specificity of the entities interrelated, like as substance, object, physical object, artifact, instrumentality, device, computer.

Commentary: sketching the meaning of relations in outline

Depending on the nature of correlatives, all relations are to be distributed into few classes according to the natures and kinds of the terms and components making up the associations. Some of them hold for any kind of entities: the relations of identity (similarity) and diversity (difference) and opposition relations of correlatives, contraries, contradictories, possession and privation. Others are determined by the nature of the entities related: substances, states, changes, or relations. As for substances, they are terms of substantial relations such as the spatial relations between bodies, the association of ideas, the mathematical relations of objects, and first-order predicate relations, linguistic relations of substantives, the social relationships between the classes and the masses, the relations of affinity or kinship, the business relations among legal entities, the ownership relations of human beings to property, the marriage relation. States are terms of the stative relations of conditions or states of affairs, the relations of qualities, the magnitude relations of quantities, functional relations. Changes are terms of the relation of cause and effect, the temporal relationships of simultaneity, contiguity, priority, and posteriority, physical interactions of events, relationships of human actions, activities or acts, as well as the higher-order logical relations. At last, the relations themselves are the terms of relational proportions or analogies as a ratio of ratios, resemblance or differences of relations, thus making the bulk of all possible relationships.

There are few fundamental assumptions guiding the inquiry of relationships, underlying principles and ways of behavior. The long disputes of the reality of relations, whether relations exist or not, or is it of our own creation or made by mother-nature, can be solved by appealing to the very fact that all beings and things show some order and mutual relationships. We just need to see that there are real relations between real things, like times and spaces, and there are relations created by the human mind, logical relations, like a hierarchy of types, and there are mixed relations, partly real, partly formal, like semantic relations. Since the reality of relationships comes from relation itself, there comes out the existence axiom: relationship exists really by (in or of) itself, over and above the things connected. In human perception and actions, there are many instances of relations, like causal links, spatial relations, and temporal relationships, which are parts of our everyday experience as much as the properties of matter. By its nature relation is an existential entity having full existence, actual in nature and mental in the mind.

Next self-evident truth is the order axiom, relation is the principle of order which determines the ways all things are arranged or associated. The axiom states that each and every relation goes with a certain order among entity types and instances. In that each and every entity is a part of the world and a relative term at the same time, it is to be postulated that all things in the world are disposed to or placed in a certain kind of order, thus making the universe an orderly and well-regulated place (or system) subject to few fundamental laws and principles.

Third, being the principle of order, relation inverts, reversing the order of things in the opposite direction; for if one entity has a relation to other, then the other will have the converse relation to the first one. Thus, if there is a relation, then we need inquire into its capacity to be inverted, reversed, or converted; for in the relations of things the sequence of their ordering, if not the sequence of their being, can always be reversed. This assumption implies that a relation in its full entirety and completeness is an interrelation, interrelationship, or interrelatedness, a reciprocal relation, relation of mutual dependence between entities. Conversion, inversion, reciprocity, or reversibility is an intrinsic property of relation of any level, specific or general. Thus, we come to the complementarity principle stated as the order reversal axiom: every relationship has its inverse counterpart (opposite or complement). Or, complementarity, convertibility, reversibility, and inversion is an essential property of any relationships, external, which are unaffected by the sides they connect, and internal, which are affected by the terms they relate. From the reversal law it follows that no inversion, no relation and vice versa. The axiom simply postulates that a relation must be two-directional, where both directions should be determined and defined, and that a full relation is combined of the given connection along with its reciprocal relation.

Additionally to the power of ordering things, there are few other essential attributes of relationships considered apart of the terms and components. First of all, it is a feature of relation to compare things of any nature and kind as to be the same or different, knowledge of which is embodied in all our reasoning about sameness and difference. Both sameness and difference will differ with regard to the kind of entities. Besides, things can be the same or different in number, species, and class, i.e., numerically, specifically, and generically. In the case of numerical sameness, we speak of absolute identity or selfsameness, the reflexive relation of one and the same entity to itself, while other forms of sameness belong to resemblance, likeness, or similarity, called relative identity. By analogy, in the event of numerical difference, we speak either of absolute diversity or relative difference. Altogether, in four respects, either with regard to substance and matter, state, the mode of changing, or the sorts of connection, among entities can be established the following sorts of comparison relations:

- generic sameness, similarity, or similitude;
- generic diversity, otherness, and heterogeneity;
- specific sameness and diversity;
- particular identity and diversity;

For example, we speak of individuals as distinct existences that they are different (many) in number and yet also the same (one) in substance, quality, or change, which is their generic kind or nature. Or, we can talk of the specific difference between two beings with reference to their intelligence, at the same time possessing the generic sameness with respect to animality; things may be similar or different as the diverse kinds of the same class. In the order of knowledge, we can consider representation as sameness or likeness between the agent knowing and the thing known. The similar reasoning applies to the sameness and diversity in the significance of terms, symbols, and words, always accompanied by the generic difference between the representatives (signs) and representees (things). Thus we come to the comparison axiom:

everything is comparable as identical, like or unlike. Namely, anything can be related to anything on the ground of anything: objects, properties (quantities, qualities, attributes), actions (changes, functions, operations, processes), and relations. Briefly, this general feature of relation to compare things can be formulated as the following equation of comparison relation founded on similarities and differences:

$$\text{Difference (Similarity)} = \text{Sameness (Diversity)} + \text{Diversity (Sameness)}$$

On a par with comparison (and opposition), there is other general sort of relations applying to all sorts of things, the part-whole relation, as that which is contained to that which contains, and vice versa, the whole-part relation, a relation of a whole to its parts and elements. It should be noted that the part-whole synthetic relation together with its complement, the whole-part analytic relation as that which contains to that which is contained belong to the highest relation classes, hyperrelations, always coming up as we divide entity classes or instances. As far as Entity or Thing or Reality or Being is the class of all classes, of which all things are members, we can hold that substance is an essential fragment of reality, state is a substantial piece of being, change is a crucial part of entity, and relation is a determinative part of reality. But each of the four types is also an aggregate of its elements (parts) formed into a whole entity, whole thing, or unity. Each of the topmost classes of thing, substances, states, changes, and relations, in turn consists of parts, either as a subdivision of its highest division, the class as a whole, or as one example of a class of thing. The former is usually defined as a specialization, subsumption, subordinate, or class inclusion relation, while the latter as an instantiation, or class membership relation; the inverse of both is a generalization, superordinate relation.

So to name relations, we should not refer to a couple of words naming things which have a certain relation to each other. Instead, the names of relations indicate being-in-relation or relation-of-being. This suggests that the collection of the relational nouns consists of some non-derivative names, as 'hierarchy' or 'analogy', and mostly derivatives from relative adjectives and verbs by adding the noun suffixes: -ANCE, -ANCY, -ENCE, -ENCY, -TUDE, -SHIP, -ITY, -ING, -AGE, -ERY, -MENT, -CION, -ION, -SION, -TION, -XION.

As an illustration of relative names may serve a collection of general names of relations: 'affinity', 'analogy', 'arrangement', 'association', 'bondage', 'causation', 'classification', 'comparison', 'contiguity', 'connection', 'contrast', 'correlation', 'correspondence', 'dependence', 'equality', 'identity', 'interaction', 'hierarchy', 'link', 'mutuality', 'opposition', 'position', 'possession', 'parallel', 'ratio', 'reciprocity', 'reference', 'resemblance', 'similarity', 'situation', 'structure', 'system', 'tie'; 'truth', 'knowledge', 'attitude', 'parentage', 'friendship', 'kinship', etc. These general names express classes or categories of relation under which fall more specific words naming the variety of species, the subordinates of relations. For instance, relative identity and diversity involve for their description such relational names as 'same' and 'other', 'likeness' and 'unlikeness', 'sameness' or 'difference', 'equality' and 'inequality', 'similarity' and 'dissimilarity'; all implying that something is the same or different only when being related to something else.

THE STANDARD DEFINITIONS OF RELATIVE WORDS

The Formula of Meaning for Relational Words:

A relation term (of relationships) \Leftrightarrow the generic term (of connections) + the characteristic expressions (of substance, states, actions)

The standard form of definition for relative names:

A relation name (a type of relation) \Leftrightarrow a generic name (a higher class of the relation) + the expressions of objects, states, or actions (a convertible property)

Illustrations of the meaningful formula are as follows:

- 'relation is an association between things'
- 'social relation is a relation between living organisms'
- 'causality is the relation between causes and effects'
- 'human relationship is a relation between people'
- 'function is a relation such that one thing is dependent on another'
- 'association is a relation resulting from interaction or dependence'
- 'logical relation is a relation between propositions'
- 'mathematical relation is a relation between mathematical expressions'
- 'connection is a relation between things'
- 'linguistic relation is a relation between linguistic forms'
- 'affinity is a connection marked by community of interests or similarity in nature or character'
- 'kinship is a connection by blood or marriage or adoption'
- 'quantitative relation is a relation between magnitudes'
- 'control is a relation of constraint of one entity by another'
- 'business relation is a relation between different business enterprises'
- 'reciprocity is a relation of mutual dependence or action or influence'
- 'interrelation is reciprocal relation or relatedness'
- 'temporal relation is a relation involving time'
- 'comparison is a relation based on similarities and differences'
- 'opposition is the relation between opposed entities'
- 'change is a relational difference between states'
- 'ownership is the relation of an owner to the thing possessed'

The kinds of generic relative names are as many as the kinds of relationships:

- Substantial relations among substances (e.g., composition, spatial relations, social and human relationships);
- Stative relations between all sorts and modes of states (qualitative, quantitative relations of numbers and magnitudes);
- Relationships of changes (causality, temporal relations);
- Relations of relations (proportions, analogies, ratios);
- Part-whole relations (species-genus, individual-class, component-object, stuff-substance, portion-mass, part (phase, period, stage, degree, level, point)/process (continuum, series, sequence, extent, succession, development, cycle, course), and part (spot, place, location)/space (area, region, expanse));
- Comparison relations (identity, resemblance, diversity, and difference)
- Opposition relations (contraries, contradictories)
- Representational (sign) relation (knowledge, significance, denotation, designation, intension, comprehension, sense, extension, reference, and representation); this is also subdivided into ideal relationships (associations of ideas, all the mental relations of ideas and images); semantic relations of meaning between signs, constructs and things; linguistic relations between language forms; mathematical relations between formal expressions; logical connections between propositions; and functional dependencies between variables.

The common rule of verbal definitions for relational verbs:

Verbs (of associations) ⇔ the universal terms (to have, to be) + the characteristic expressions (of substances, states, or changes)

- 'to relate is to have a relation to some entity'
- 'to relate is to be in a relationship with other entity'
- 'to differ from is to be different from something'
- 'to resemble is to be like'
- 'to stand for is to be a substitute for'
- 'to matter is to be of importance'
- 'to represent (typify, symbolize) is to be a symbol'

The alternative standard verbal formulation implies the generic verb of associations distinguished by the terms or components making up the relationships:

Verbs (of associations) ⇔ the generic term (the general class of the relationship) + the expressions (of substances, states, or changes)

- 'to interrelate is to relate to each other'
- 'to link is to connect something with something else'
- 'to associate is to make a connection'
- 'to apply to is to have reference to something'
- 'to concern is to have to do with'
- 'to concern is to be of importance to'

A set of relative verbs covering the whole domain of relationships (among different entity levels of signs, thoughts, and things) includes:

the verbal names of relationships in general ('be in a relationship with', 'have a relationship to', 'relate', 'interrelate', 'connect', 'associate', 'tie in', 'link', 'refer', 'concern', 'bear on') the part-whole relation verbs ('divide', 'compose', 'categorize', 'classify');

the comparison predicates ('compare', 'identify', 'resemble', 'differ');

the verbs of opposition ('oppose', 'contrast', 'contradict');

the verbs indicating causality ('do', 'make', 'determine', 'initiate', 'effect', 'induce', 'stimulate');

the verbs of spatial relations ('displace', 'transfer', 'place', 'position', 'locate', 'site', 'direct');

the verbs of temporal relations ('time', 'endure', 'elapse', 'pass', 'expire', 'precede', 'follow');

the verbs of meaning relationships ('apply', 'denote', 'connote', 'refer to', 'designate', 'signify', 'represent', 'stand by', 'symbolize', 'mean', 'express', 'communicate', 'indicate', 'depict', 'record');

the verbs of social relationships and interactions ('interact', 'communicate', 'control', 'meet', 'transact', 'trade', 'deal', 'compete', 'contact')

WordNet 2.0: abstraction (relation, time, space), state (relationship, relationship);

WordNet 2.1: entity {abstract entity (relation; communication; attribute (time, space, or infinite, temporal property))};

Remarks

Comparatively extensive and very instructive, the classification below suffers from several principal errors: the wrong definition, relation is not an abstraction but a real entity connecting two or more things. Besides, it asks for new reclassification where the spatial relation, the human-human relations (social, business, personal, familial, affinity relationship), with human-property relations go under substantial relationships. The interrelation, connection, and association should not be marked as separate but rather used as synonyms of relation, instead; for, typically, relation is defined as an association or connection among things. The part, portion and foundation are not relations, but rather the terms or correlatives. Again, the taxonomy is missing some significant relation types which are not distinctly identified, namely the relations occurring in nature (physical interactions, chemical reactions, and biological relationships), in mind (mental, psychological relations), in society, and in history. The scheme also misrepresents the nature and role of causality and causes, closely interpreted as a particular sort of individual events, although the types of causal relations expressed by causative verbs are well specified. The temporal relation should include the range of temporal properties (temporal order, duration, and rate). The mathematical relations are missing the set-theoretical relationships. Reciprocity is the inherent property of any relations. The magnitude relation together with the quality associations will fall under the stative relations. Last but not least, the semantic (meaning) relations of signs, constructs and extra-linguistic things, like as significance, denotation, designation, intension, comprehension, sense, extension, reference, and representation, confused with the general relations: the whole to part and the part to whole and the hierarchy relations, subordination and super-ordination.
